In a TDD system, in which there are two time slots per frame, ranging is carried out by sending ranging reference signals, which are known to the transmitter and the receiver, to the terminal. The terminal measures a time delay between transmission of a ranging reference signal and reception of the ranging reference signal and determines an amount of time offset between ranging and the base station on the basis of the measured time delay. The range is then set on the basis of the estimated timing offset value and the apparatus adjusts the transmission
