Genomics, metagenomics, metabolomics, transcriptomics, and non-coding RNA sequencing can help to control and manage the honeybee (Apis mellifera) health. A decline of the honeybee health has become evident worldwide. The number of wild and managed honeybees has been reduced by the presence of serious pathogens, several new viruses and pesticides, as well as environmental stressors. Therefore, a strong need for finding novel solutions is evident. The study of microbial communities associated with honeybees may help to better understand the honeybee-pathogen and honeybee-pesticide interactions, as well as to develop new pesticides and explore new therapies to control diseases. Here, we show in silico and in vivo data mining of the honeybee microbiome and their possible implications for honeybee health. The honeybees' gastrointestinal tract (GIT) has a relatively small bacterial community, dominated by aerobic Gram-positive bacteria. Microbial identification indicates that bacterial species previously detected in honeybees are regularly found in animal excrements, thus leading to the conclusion that honeybees can be considered as sentinels for monitoring microbial communities in environmental samples.
