the human body and is a reservoir of stem cells. The regenerative capacity of muscle tissue could be harnessed for the treatment of many diseases and injuries, including muscular dystrophy, aging-related muscle degeneration, and acute muscle injury. Skeletal muscle has two major types of structural cells - myocytes and satellite cells, which are the major source of muscle progenitor cells. Satellite cells are one of the most extensively studied muscle-specific stem cells. During muscle regeneration they proliferate, differentiate, and fuse with one another to build up the fiber. While these satellite cells are considered to be a major source of muscle progenitors, in which expansion is possible, their use for regenerative purposes is often limited by their self-renewal and differentiation potential. Recent studies in our laboratory have shown that bone marrow derived stem cells can contribute to muscle progenitor regeneration in a satellite cell specific manner. We have now shown that this population of stem cells is capable of originating all types of muscle progenitor cells, including the different classes of satellite cells as well as skeletal myoblasts, myocytes and angioblasts. In this proposal, we will investigate the molecular signaling mechanisms 82138339de
