In manufacturing a semiconductor device, after a semiconductor wafer is formed, alignment is required on the semiconductor wafer for performing photolithography and implanting ions into the semiconductor wafer. As a technique for realizing the alignment, a method has been used in which an alignment mark is formed on a wafer (for example, refer to Japanese Patent Laid-open Publication No. 2003-000462). When using the alignment mark, it is important to align the wafer with high accuracy. In order to align a wafer, a technique in which a single wafer is aligned with respect to a single substrate has been generally used in the related art. For example, in a method in which a wafer is rotated with respect to a substrate such as a mask and subjected to alignment, the wafer is rotated at a constant angle, and this angle is searched for. In this technique, in order to detect which position of the substrate the center of the wafer is in, an alignment mark needs to be formed on the substrate in advance, and therefore, a substrate having a large area cannot be aligned. When using a technique in which the wafer is aligned with respect to the substrate once, it is difficult to estimate to what extent the wafer has been aligned during the alignment. This is because the state of alignment of the substrate is not reflected on the wafer. For this reason, when the alignment is performed, the wafer and the substrate need to be set to have similar alignment states.The outcome of liver transplantation in patients with esophageal varices. The aim of this study was
