The body of the 58-kilogram bull shark washed up on the Paraburdoo beach near Ceduna on January 29. It may sound like the corpse of a shark, but in fact it was that of a snake. It was at the beach, paddocks and homes of the local indigenous community, who treated it with respect. 'Blue-white' colouration is characteristic of sharks, but that shade of grey is actually the result of a skin infection caused by bacteria that affects the jaws of the shark. It shows the end of a shark's life - death by shark attack. When the fish dies, the belly slowly turns grey, and if the water is still it can take a full two weeks for the dead skin to sink to the bottom. Attacks by sharks account for more than 800 deaths a year worldwide, although Australia is thought to have the fewest encounters. Bull sharks - long, slender and fast - are not a threat to humans, but a small bite from a white pointer or a dusky shark could be fatal. Only 30 people have died from shark bites in Australia since 1900. 7.00pm AEDT, Friday 29 January 2011 Brisbane TimesPresident Obama is warning Republicans that their refusal to bring up their immigration bill is putting the country's security at risk. In an interview with Univision's Jorge Ramos that aired Thursday, Obama warned that the slowdown in legislation on issues such as border security and illegal immigration will get in the way of a full solution to both.
