As pharmaceutical companies, hospitals and clinics continue to struggle with shortages of medical supplies, including syringes, fillers and medical tools, the Australian Paralympic Federation has placed an order with a German firm that will sell a new home infusion pump. The pump, made by Medtronic, has been used in places like New Zealand and the United Kingdom to deliver chemotherapy and store information about treatment regimens. It allows patients to remove patches and connect the pump to deliver their medication directly through the skin or, in the case of stored data, using the IP connections in the pump. The Australian Paralympic Federation says the $25,000 unit will allow Australian wheelchair athletes to train and compete effectively. The order, which is part of a $7 million contract with Medtronic, represents an agreement the company entered in 2015. The contract is worth $7 million, but is split equally between hardware and training software. The federal government spent close to $30 million funding one of the world's most sophisticated drug delivery machines. It is called NexDip (Neosan's Needle-free Drug Infusion System) and was installed at the National Health and Medical Research Council's (NHMRC) National Facility at Concord Hospital in 2015. After two years of living with the machine in a water-filled chamber, NHMRC says the machine was not connected to any hospital system and its use was limited to two specific medical conditions. Peggy Young, a research leader with the NHMRC, says the machine, which is equipped with an IP connection, means people with a range of illnesses can be treated for their conditions. "It is essentially a pump and software," she says. "It delivers medication in the form of a liquid or powder, and it can manage the medicine dispensing, measurement and delivery." A spokeswoman for the Department of Health says the pump is far superior to the current methods of delivering drugs such as some prescription meds which can be given as drops, as they often require frequent administration. The spokeswoman says it is used by doctors in Australia as the only way to avoid needles and also to treat people with conditions including stroke, heart failure, diabetes, cancer and asthma. "The department is in the process of evaluating the equipment we will have used at the Paralympic Games in Rio de Janeiro next year," she says. "

Q: Find Duplicates In A List And Keep The First Occurrence Of The Duplicates I have a list of products that the first column is the product ID, the second column is the list of comments that the user has made, and the third column is the date time the comment was made. So, what I would like to do is keep a list of the most recently made comments for each product, but since users can make comments in bulk when they come to a product, I have a situation where some comments are duplicated. I have a working solution using Linq to get the most recent comment for each product, but I can't quite get the latest comments of multiple products to appear as a single comment. var q = _db.Comments.Where(x => x.ProductID == productID).OrderByDescending(x => x.CreatedAt).Select(x => x.CreatedAt).FirstOrDefault(); I assume I need to do some sort of join, but I'm not sure how to get that working, or if it's even the best method to go about this. Any help or direction would be greatly appreciated. A: Assuming that CommentDetails is a collection of CommentDetails (you could just put all the IDs in the WHERE clause): var q = _db.Comments.Where(x => x.ProductID == productID).Select(x => new { CommentID = x.CommentDetails.ID, Comment = x.CommentDetails.Name, Date = x.CreatedAt }).GroupBy(x => x.CommentID)
