How do I install a driver for a Marvell Yukon ethernet card in Linux? How do I get a WiFi driver for my integrated card? A: What is a Wi-Fi driver? A Wi-Fi (IEEE 802.11) driver is a piece of software to communicate with an 802.11 radios and its antennas. It performs a lot of operations: transmitting and receiving on radio channels radio scanning joining an ad-hoc network connecting to an access point Wi-Fi, and its development, has progressed a lot in recent times. After the release of Wi-Fi based on 802.11n protocol (802.11n-2009), software for managing 802.11n radios became available and gained popularity. But, there is one thing which Wi-Fi drivers didn't change: They do not transmit data on radio channels but only perform commands. So, Wi-Fi drivers' firmware should be installed on your USB radio board.

Understanding Wi-Fi drivers Just like most other drivers, Wi-Fi drivers have a configuration file. This file is located in `/etc/modprobe.d` and it has a name like `wl.conf`. Your Wi-Fi driver is the file with that name. By default, there is no file with such name. How do I add a Wi-Fi driver to kernel? There are three ways to add Wi-Fi drivers to the kernel. 1st way: Using `module_param()` If you don't have any need of certain Wi-Fi driver, there is no need to load it into the kernel. Before loading this driver, an administrator may use the `module_param()` function to configure this driver. This `module_param()` will set a boolean value to 1 when the administrator has need of that Wi-Fi driver. In that case, when Wi-Fi driver is being loaded, Wi-Fi parameters set by this function will be used to configure the driver. 2nd way: Using a driver's init function When you have a driver with a certain init function, you may use this init function to load this driver into the kernel. The init function
