In the present study, we investigated whether the expression of conditioned place preference (CPP) induced by methamphetamine could be mediated by ventral forebrain structures in the mouse brain. Conditioned place preference to methamphetamine was induced by a Pavlovian conditioning paradigm. An experienced mouse was injected with methamphetamine (1 mg/kg, intraperitoneally) in a specific compartment and then exposed to a non-motivated compartment, which was also equipped with a cage which was previously given to another experienced mouse, for 10 min. Six hours after conditioned methamphetamine injection, mice were given place preference test in the compartment where they had been conditioned. The results showed that the expression of conditioned methamphetamine preference was prevented by a unilateral excitotoxic lesion of the ventral tegmental area (VTA), which produced a reduction in dopamine (DA) turnover in the nucleus accumbens (NAc) and the hippocampus. Furthermore, lesion of the amygdala, which produces a deficit in associative learning and emotion, also prevented expression of conditioned methamphetamine preference. The present results clearly suggest that DA functioning in the ventral forebrain is essential in the expression of methamphetamine CPP. In conventional tire manufacturing, the carcass reinforcement is generally attached to the beads of a tire by anchoring at each bead the ends of the reinforcement with the aid of an anchoring element. An anchoring is generally formed by a metal plate anchored to the bead and wrapped with the reinforcement. The metal plate provides additional mass to the anchoring element, which may be the bead of a first carcass ply wrapped with the anchoring element. In order to facilitate tire mounting and
