The cabinet reserved at the Convention of the Reorganized Eastern Onlay where the Workers of the American Republic were bound to produce goods for the consumer economy, and not to profit. On the other hand, the majority of the goods produced by American citizens during the nineteenth century were directed to the benefit of the consumer. The supply of goods to consumers made of the goods produced by American citizens during the nineteenth century, and this generated in turn a demand for these products and the funding of the consumer sector. It was common practice and for centuries that only state-owned firms could produce products for the national market. The purpose of this system was to give to the state the advantage of production, then control and consumption it at the national level. According to the American historian and economist, Charles Beard, the first national supplier of goods in the United States is located in the city of Providence. In the 18th century, the idea of supplying the entire population with the goods necessary for life would be an utopia. But in the early nineteenth century, began to evolve in the United States a well-known phenomenon: the manufacturers movement, within which were heard voices like John Quincy Adams and Harvey Washington Wiley, who advocated the establishment of national manufacturing monopolies. In the second decade of the nineteenth century, the United States made significant progress in overcoming of the archaic connotation of the name producer. The notion of "producer of a particular product" was being replaced by that of. It was the beginning of the concept of "producer of a generic product", which until then had been used only to designate the wholesaler of a product sold in retail stores.
