Reclaiming and Displacing the West: The Case of Abya Yala Photo by Czay Scott The story of Abya Yala is interesting for a number of reasons. First, the area in question has been contested since before the arrival of European settlers. In March 1640, English explorer John Smith discovered and named New Ireland, which encompassed the entire eastern half of the island of New Ireland, and claimed it for England. After the English lost the war with the Dutch, they regained control of this territory in 1667, as part of a settlement in the Hague that brought the Dutch and English to a peace treaty. The treaty forced the Dutch to relinquish their colonies in the Western Hemisphere. In the late 19th century, the Dutch claimed this territory as part of their colonial empire in Southeast Asia. The Philippine Colonization Act of 1902 granted the Dutch the right to colonize the Philippines by establishing forts, towns, and villages throughout the islands. In 1910, the Dutch assumed control of Abya Yala, the area that includes Kaiping, Tarakan, Cikagal, and Malang. The Dutch claimed that the land belonged to them, and Dutch authorities forced inhabitants to relocate from that area, confiscating their land, weapons, and houses. Photo by Czay Scott From 1910 to 1918, thousands of villagers left Abya Yala, and made their way to a British-run resettlement camp near Ambalaman in the South West of the Philippines. From 1918 until World War II, the Japanese occupied the Dutch colonies in Southeast Asia. In February 1944, the Japanese had abandoned Abya Yala to the British. In July of that same year, the Japanese returned with the intention of reoccupying the territory, in support of their allies, the Empire of Japan. The territories were initially occupied by British and American forces during the Battle of Bataan. The Pacific Theater of Operations saw American forces withdraw to the Bataan Peninsula, while Japanese forces moved further north on Luzon. In November 1944, the Americans counterattacked, forcing the Japanese out of the Philippines. At this point, in January 1945, the territory was occupied by Allied forces, and they declared it free territory. Yet the British quickly realized that the term "free territory" doesn't necessarily translate into free access. They imposed a war-time economy, and tried to control the flow of people and goods in the region.
