The present invention relates to an identification code detectable probe of an optical fiber for communication (hereafter referred to as an optical probe) and, more particularly, to an optical probe incorporating an optical identification code detector. Recently, in the application of, for example, optical fibre communication, an optical fibre coding technique for transmitting data with the aid of an optical coding technique has been used. The optical fibre coding technique is based on the principle that information is represented by optical intensity variations in the optical fibre transmission medium. When using this type of optical fibre coding technique, each optical fibre is provided with an identification code that identifies the optical fibre as a code object. The identification code is detected with the aid of an optical detector such as a photodiode of a light receiving section of a light source mounted on the light transmitting side and a photodiode of an optical detector mounted on the light receiving side of the optical fibre. The known optical fibre coding technique has been developed on the basis of a shift registration system (or a table coding system). In this system, an identification code is formed at a certain relative position of the light source and the optical fibre. According to the shift registration system, a light beam is irradiated to the optical fibre to determine whether or not the shift registration condition is satisfied on the basis of a changed light intensity when the light beam is re-inputted to the optical fibre. The shift registration condition is established at every predetermined shift quantity in a predetermined shift direction on the basis of a basic code sequence and a reference code. When an optically distributed code is established in the optical fibre in accordance with the basic code sequence and the reference code, each optical fibre is identified as a code object by the number of bits of the basic code sequence and the reference
