Dragon Quest III was released on the GameBoy Advance in 2001. Dragon Quest IV was released on the PlayStation 2 in 2002, and in 2003, Dragon Quest V was released on the GameBoy Advance. In those games, the avatar “Kain” wields the power of the Dragon Ring to defeat evil. The subject matter was thought up by producer Yuji Horii, who became the president of Enix at the time. The project was put on hold in 1998 after Enix bought the rights to the Dragon Quest series. The rights were held by The Pokémon Company, Inc. From 2014 to 2018, the company’s third president and CEO, Yosuke Matsuda, organized the project. Matsuda and the team researched the series from scratch, started a new project, and decided to name it Dragon Quest VII. They also decided to keep the combat system of the original Dragon Quest games, using the new Dragon Quest VII as the base. The development was announced in August of 2014, with illustrations of the Dragon Quest VII – The World Ends with You characters appearing in the August issue of Weekly Shōnen Jump magazine. In the following year, an official website was launched. An E3 2015 trailer was also released at that time. Nintendo of Europe, CRI Middle East, and United Kingdom announced the game for release on June 16.
