Influenza virus infection of mammalian hosts results in a complex interaction between the virus and the cellular environment. The initial interactions between virus and the host are mediated by cell-surface receptors, such as sialic acids and gangliosides, and are followed by a humoral response targeting the virus and the cellular cytotoxicity associated with immune recognition of viral proteins by the T-lymphocyte-restricted CD8+ T-cell receptor. All of these interactions ultimately determine the level of virus replication, the course of disease, and protective immunity. Here, we discuss how receptor-driven processes directly influence the outcome of virus infection and the balance between virus replication and clearance.
