increased risk of death after emergent or urgent sternotomy for acute myocardial infarction. Transient increases in pulmonary capillary wedge pressure or mean pulmonary artery pressures often occur after mitral valve surgery. The pulmonary wedge pressure has been shown to be an independent predictor of death in patients with acute myocardial infarction. This study investigated the association between these increases in pulmonary capillary wedge pressure or mean pulmonary artery pressures and increased risk of death. A case-control analysis was performed of 118 patients who had mitral valve replacement surgery after acute myocardial infarction and 57 matched control subjects. Two to 6 days before or after the operation, pulmonary wedge pressures and mean pulmonary artery pressures were measured by pulmonary artery catheterization in the patients. Analysis included the occurrence of 30-day or in-hospital postoperative mortality. There were no significant differences in the frequency of pulmonary wedge pressure and mean pulmonary artery pressures > or =20 mm Hg, > or =20 to or =30 to or =40 to or =50 mm Hg at any time before or after the operation between the patients and control subjects. The frequency of pulmonary wedge pressures > or =20 mm Hg before the operation was also similar between the patients and control subjects. In-hospital postoperative mortality for patients with mitral valve replacement was 10.2% (12 of 118) and 29.8% (17 of 57) for the patients and control subjects (odds ratio 0.34, 95% confidence interval 0.14 to 0.84), respectively. The frequency of patients who died and control subjects who died with pulmonary wedge pressures
