- Hives: Build hives from the ground up. Each hive is different, from roof designs to depths of the hive, bees to the queen, you have the freedom to make any hive you want! - Swarms: Each hive can have a swarm of bees if they choose to. If a swarm finds a hive that it prefers, it may attempt to make a new hive there and then move in. - Milk: This is the process of harvesting the nectar from flowers to make honey. With the right equipment, you can harvest up to 16 units of honey at once. - Queen: You don't have to have a queen if you don't want to, but it is recommended. Queens are very important in bee keeping. - Favorites: As time goes on you will build special favorites hives that make it easy for you to pick up your favorite types of hives and swarms. You can also create your own favorites by combining different hives and swarms. - Honey: Bees collect nectar, typically from flowers, and add it to wax cells as honey. Sometimes they even eat it! - Bees: See the world through the eyes of an ant! - Other Species: Other species like bumblebees and wasps can be placed in hives, with the right care they can be cared for and eventually bred together and used in your queens and, in some cases, with your honey. - Crowd Control: Bees like to stay together. Hives should never have more bees than the number of the cells. Crowding damages bees and may even cause a hive to fail. - End Game: In the end game you will have to fill your delivery trucks with enough honey to make a profit. You are also able to buy a property that will allow you more space to grow your empire! If you like this game, you might also enjoy: - Impetus - The Lost Crown - Overgrowth - Hey! If there's anything we learned from the Halloween season, it's that mazes can be scary. And if there's one thing we love more than scary mazes, it's haunted houses. Unfortunately, mazes come with all the have-yous we mentioned above (autographs and photo moments, this time of year for the kids, the overstimulation, etc.) spook houses, however, do without. Instead, a mysterious house, replete with creepy sounds, unexpected noises, random objects, and fiber-optic-lit walls can really give you the Halloween-from-hell. If you're interested in this spook capital or know someone who is, our mixtape contains all the scary infographics and everything else you'll need to scare the pants off of someone—and scare yourself. It's no surprise that haunted houses are commonly built around a history of a past of the building as a haunted house. (See: House of Wax, Terror Mansion, Dead End Ghost Town.) In fact, that's the reason why these houses often come with a distinct set of "rules." For example, one of these rules might be "You can never leave the house" and another might be "No touching the props." Some haunted houses are totally free-range and open to the public, where the people inside can be claustrophobic. At the Windsor Mansion, for example, there are no outer doors, meaning that no one can leave the house. On the east side, you'll see a barricade where the doorways hang over the street. On the north-facing side, the doorways are underground. As expected, the old parts of a house really reek and shed of their many seasons as well as the presence of ghosts and crazy stuff that happened there. In addition, certain parts of a house can be "spooktacular" (in a good way) or not. For example, the date you were born is usually a good segue into a spooky room. But if a room in a house is completely bare, there's not much you can do with it. Haunted houses have turned people into crazy geniuses on the Internet. This madness is most visible when you read the many stories, guides, and reviews on Yelp. A lot of the stories focus on fantastic twists and turns while others focus on "thanks to this website, I now know these secrets are totally open to everyone." A haunted house can be an experience that can be recorded
