What's new:

The title of George Melies' short film Island of Lost Souls (1921), may have influenced a franchise of films with the same name and plot originally released in the 1920s. The films are known collectively as the Island of Lost Souls. The Island of Lost Souls, commonly called The Island, filmed from 1925 to 1935, is a popular genre of adventure films featuring stranded people attempting to survive on various "remote" islands. In most versions of the film, the location is also used for the fictitious nature of the story. The Island of Lost Souls is noted for being the first "talking" serial. Notable sequences in the film involve: (a) the famous "dog dance" sequence in which a man and a dog chase each other around a tree while trying to catch each other; (b) the fight between a girl and a male boxer in a ring; and (c) the general lack of cutting between scenes, giving the illusion of continuous action throughout the film. The camera work of the film is centered on the dogs' faces, eyes, and mouths while people are in various positions on a natural setting. The Hero Island Plot Beginning with "A Beachcomber on the Amazon" (1925), the plucky duo comprising Tom Collins and Win (George Kuwa) are shown to have been cast out from a boat leaving the fictional country of "Hero Land". Although the Beachcombers find various tropical fruits to keep them going, they find themselves stranded on this island. They come under suspicion from the natives, who believe them to be thieves, but the Beachcomber save the natives' lives by utilizing a magic rope that transports a "clumsy old man" to their rescue. This man has a problem with his memories and reasons with the natives in order to get them to take him back to the mainland. In "Heroes Never Die" (1926), it is revealed that the man's family is in reality the Beachcombers, and the villainous Teck has stolen the magic rope. The Beachcombers then rescue Teck from the natives and use the rope to return to Hero Land. In the final two entries from this section, "The Island of Lost Men" (1928) and "Lost Land of the Jungle King" (1935), Teck forces the Beachcombers to endure various hardships while traveling together to return the stolen rope. Although Teck's code was to destroy it, the Beachcombers destroy it after he shows them
