To begin your mastery of Photoshop, see Chapter 2. For more information about how to use Photoshop, flip to Chapters 4–. Understanding a common vocabulary The following sections introduce you to some of the most common terms that you'll see in the many articles and tutorials on the Web for Photoshop. Blending, blending modes, and layers Blending modes are the ways in which layers can be blended together. Layers are the building blocks of your images. Blending layers together provides you with a host of options in which to manipulate your images. Layers are a fundamental part of Photoshop. Understanding how to blend layers properly and the difference between blending and composite modes is part of mastering the program. Blending refers to the process of blending or combining two images together, through one of the blending modes, to create a new image. Compositing refers to combining two images into a single image, as in Photoshop's layers. Blending modes You can create many different types of photographs, from a single point of interest to a wide panorama, and the best way to accomplish that is by blending layers together. Photoshop makes blending a breeze because it offers so many blending modes — 20 in all — that give you the ability to blend layers together to create any effect you want. Blending modes can do much more than simply copy or mask images together. With the help of the five blending modes, you can get creative in the creation of your images. In addition, you can use certain blending modes as a way to transition an image from one style to another, or you can use it to combine two images together to create a new image. The following list shows you a few of the most common blending modes, the type of results you can expect, and some things to keep in mind when using them: Hue/Saturation: This blending mode is the simplest of the five. You simply put a layer of your image on top of another. Then, you apply the Hue/Saturation blending mode to the layers to create a color inversion. The color is inversed simply because the top layer is black and the bottom layer is white. Color: This blending mode is also the simplest of the blending modes. You simply apply a color to the layer of your image. In addition, you can add in a color adjustment to modify that color. Other than adding a color, you can adjust the brightness, contrast, and saturation of the layer.

What We've Learned About Geeks and City Dads - starpilot ===== mc32 The "techie" stereotype, if you will, is pretty much gone. Like I said, in terms of people available for a startup or other tech oriented jobs, it's more like the beanie-wearing janitor than the dyed-haired, "I got into woodworking because I'm really passionate about it". I do, however, think that the next generation of geeks will probably adopt a more "mother earthy" aesthetic, say, that of The Beatles, saying, "I've got a prescription for that". No more Donner Party on your sleeve, or T-shirts. ~~~ evv This is not universally true. Having worked in a city that has some startup activity, there are still plenty of people looking for talent. If you're a white male with experience in the information technology sector and can show a passion for programming, there are still plenty of jobs for you. ----- sutterbomb I'm not that familiar with the non-techie side, but I've met a number of urban dads who are hugely into tech, and almost all of them are into startups. Urban dads and dads-to-be are very interested in technology as it's currently available, and they're as likely to have kids in the next 5-10 years as any average dad. I would think this would be obvious, but I'd be happy to be proven wrong, because I wish this was true. ~~~ ender7 The interesting thing is that there seems to be a positive correlation between getting the start of a startup and having kids. I suspect that this is driven more by the fact that the people who have kids don't consider startups until they have kids, and by the time they're pregnant they have in mind a lifestyle that's incompatible with a startup (or other jobs, for that matter). Also, kids are a life-changing event, and there's a negative correlation between having life-changing events and founding startups -- after you're a parent, you may want to scale back your own ambitions. Or maybe
