Q: How to restart script that was being executed with Control-C in a bash shell? The script I created is the one I'll explain. It creates a complex diagram with pyplot (see: plotly.plot_geo). The diagram is refreshed every 1 second. In the end, I created it because at the beginning of this project I wanted to send an SMS through this script. So after the first plotting of the map, I entered the SMS sending function. That was the moment I realized that Control-C was the only way to stop my script and refresh the diagram. Now I want to make it so that after you stop it, you can restart it from where you left off. Any ideas? A: You probably want to try to re-initialize all plots by calling pyplot.gcf().clear() before calling plot_geo. A: If your script is sending SMS the way it's been implemented, then you have to call the SMS sending function in a different script or write the SMS sending code in the first script. It's not very easy to do, but it's not impossible. If your script is "sit down and play the SMS for me" kind of implementation, then you can simply call your main script and send the Control-C there. It's simplest with a single command line (or script) like: python -c '/path/to/main.py' & If you want it in the background, then it's a little more complicated, but it's doable: #!/usr/bin/env python #... script containing function to call SMSs... import subprocess def sms_sending(): """Send SMSs to one

As far as the blood is concerned, we should all be reminded that the mutation rate is extremely high. In fact, if you can come up with a reasonable estimate, the percentage of people who are carriers of at least one gene for Huntington's is probably no lower than 50%, so any time you see something that looks like the disease, it's probably only 50% true. Similarly, a good case could be made that there are many people who have the early symptoms of Alzheimer's disease, but it never gets diagnosed because it has a so-called "misdiagnosis" with another disease. So if 50% or more of the population is (or may be) pre-symptomatic, what does that say about researchers, who simply assume that 50% of mice experience Huntington's in some form? The mathematical theory that says that something will occur with a 50% probability is called "statistical rounding". I won't belabor this for long - the bottom line is this: when you have people making up their own rules, it's only a matter of time until you end up with an erroneous conclusion. The problem doesn't stop there. Let's take a look at another common neurodegenerative disease. There are actually two major types of Alzheimer's disease: the "early" type and the "late" type. The early type is the one that you may not know you have. They are only detectable by brain scans, which are currently not readily accessible to most people. Even if you do get brain scans, it's probable that your doctors have never heard of a name for the
