Russia's ambassador to Afghanistan, Zairbek Mirgayev, announced the deal today in a press conference on the Afghan side of the border. The deal has been in the works for two years and will see the Defense Ministry transfer to the Russian military a 440-square-mile tract of land near the Amu Darya river. It includes a site that the Americans use to patrol routes in the country. In exchange, Afghanistan would hand over to Russia the 40-square-mile Parun Camp which is used for training Afghan forces. "This is the first time in a hundred years that the Russian-Afghan border has been stabilized," Mirgayev said. According to the ambassador, the agreement marks the first time a non-NATO country has established a foothold in Afghanistan. The action is likely meant to buy time for the U.S. as it begins to draw down and shift its troops out of Afghanistan. The land swap amounts to about 40 percent of Afghanistan's land and will give Russia control of the country's border south of the Amu Darya river. "This exchange shows that Afghanistan's future is in Europe," Mirgayev said. Given that Russia is interested in the development of the war-torn country, the agreement is far from a concession. "Our aim is to strengthen our relations with the Afghan people and build their country's security," Mirgayev said, "We are still interested in increasing the number of contracts in Afghanistan." He stressed that the land swap was a long-term project. "We will be interested in implementing projects related to the development of our economic relations with Afghanistan and we hope this will last for a long time," the ambassador added. NATO military officials in Afghanistan refused to comment on the validity of the agreement
