The way we talk about the 2018 midterm elections is not the way we talk about elections on a regular basis. It feels an awful lot like the way we talk about the 2016 presidential election. It's simply a lot more vivid, and it's much easier to keep track of how each side is doing, because we have so many more people actively tracking what's happening. But in retrospect, it's not especially useful to think about political polarization, at least not in terms of the relationship between the Democratic and Republican parties. It's very much the case that a lot of Democrats are happy, and even enthusiastic, about Trump's performance. And it's also very much the case that a lot of Republicans are unhappy with Trump, but maybe mostly they're unhappy with the broader GOP movement, or they're unhappy with what they see as a cultural slide away from core Republican principles. The idea that the GOP might be, or is, doomed is extremely popular among certain conservative writers, though less popular among those of more mainstream or moderate bent. But on the other side of the partisan divide, there are a lot of Democrats who are unhappy with the president but not necessarily with the Democratic Party. It's also true that there are a lot of moderate or center-left Democrats who are happy with the president, but they're willing to accept some version of the liberal vision of things because that's
