Air compressors are used to compress air that is provided as a working fluid to a pneumatic device, such as a pneumatic tool, an accumulator or any other device utilizing a pneumatic system. Air compressors typically include a compressor assembly and a motor assembly coupled to the compressor assembly to rotate a shaft that is drivingly coupled to a crankshaft that is drivingly coupled to a piston which compresses air and provides a continuous supply of compressed air to a downstream device. In some instances, as shown in FIG. 1, to overcome problems such as oil contamination of the piston and associated components, a mechanical oil separator 10 may be disposed downstream of the compressor assembly 10. A mechanical oil separator 10 can include a separator housing 12 enclosing a separator piston 14 disposed within a separator chamber 16. The separator housing 12 is coupled to an end cap 18 and has an upper end cap 20 and a lower end cap 22, with a cylinder bore 24 formed therethrough. A gas compressor assembly 26 of the conventional air compressor with a mechanical oil separator 10 is shown in FIGS. 1-2.
