"Great parenting has nothing to do with handling at all. It has everything to do with guiding your child in the right direction." ~ Unknown I'm about to plow into the spiritual talk of "closeness" and "distance" that most people care so passionately about. If you're a modern-day young adult, no doubt you are familiar with these terms. For some reason our generations of parents are very good at using them as excuses for our kids' behavior. So, what do we mean when we say that our kids are "too close" to us, that they're "too distant" from us, and that we are "overly" attached to them? I believe that using these terms as reasons to hang up our phones at dinnertime is not fair. You are not "too distant." You're simply out of touch. Yet, we seem to be very comfortable with that. Do you want closeness and distance? If you're the person who wants distance, then your favorite parenting book is My Loved One's Secret. It makes no sense to say that you just want your children to be distant from you. We all want closeness with our kids. Yet, as adults we seem to be wired for distance. It's as if we're programmed to run away from one another. Not only is this a physical and mental detriment, but it's downright immature. If you love your kids, you want to see them grow, and you want to raise them in love, you'll want to be close. You'll want them to come to you for questions and guidance and you'll want to nurture that relationship. You might want them to hide in the closet when you need to change your clothes or you might want them to listen to the instructions of a teacher. The path to closeness can be complicated. Yes, let your kids be distant and protect them from things that might harm them. I'm not advocating that. The problem is you've chosen the perfect moment to start talking to your kids about sex, drugs, alcohol, violence, pornography, bullying, and so forth. Now, of course you love them and want to protect them from harm, but you're also using them to start your talk. It's so easy to say something like, "Hey, we just talked about sex, drugs, and alcohol at a time when these things are very real in your lives.

When you have a child with hearing problems the world sounds different. Trying to hear what they are saying, so you can communicate, is not easy. They may hear people speak as if they are not there, or they may not hear at all. By the age of seven and one half most children with hearing loss are fully implantable and have a hearing aide that they use to communicate. It has been very difficult for schools to provide these devices to those who need them. In addition, schools have had trouble getting the hearing aides to work properly. Without these devices, which are surgically implanted, the child may miss out on education and function in school. The child and the family will not be able to communicate with one another.
