Greece's new far-right leader stepped up his rhetoric against immigration, saying the country can barely survive the flood of refugees entering Europe, and threatening a "reckoning" for refugees after the March elections. "There are only two ways out of this impasse: a reckoning with those who cause this problem, or an exodus of migrants," Alexis Tsipras, leader of the left-wing Syriza party, said in a keynote speech. "All immigrants, no matter where from, whether they are refugees or not, have the right to enter Europe." His comments come ahead of the March election, in which Syriza could end years of right-wing governments that have presided over a financial meltdown that has seen unemployment top 26 percent. Tsipras is also expected to rule out any return to the eurozone, a pledge that he made during his party's 2015 election campaign. The 68-year-old former prime minister's speech also came as migrant flows from Turkey to Greece returned to their highest level since 2016, with thousands reaching the easternmost port of Piraeus. "After the elections, our government will work for a European solution for refugees," he said. "We will have a proposal to return to Europe those who have the right to enter there. To those who do not need protection and those who have a right to protection." Greece has suffered a huge influx of asylum seekers from the nearby Middle East and Africa since the start of the conflict in Syria in 2011. Since June 2015, more than 181,000 refugees have arrived in Greece, and a further 85,000 are estimated to be stuck in camps on the islands of Lesbos, Chios and Samos. Around 1,300 people have died in the Mediterranean Sea in the same period. Tensions spiked late last year with the arrival of thousands of migrants from Africa and the Middle East at a time of deep economic crisis, causing fights and scuffles with police and leaving hundreds injured. Thousands of protesters blockaded a border crossing last week to prevent a ship carrying migrants from docking there, amid fears the vessel may be in imminent danger. Last month, a coastguard official died while trying to prevent a group of migrants from ramming a boat off the Greek island of Samos. Greece's police
