A New York City chiropractor is recovering after he was brutally beaten, robbed, and stabbed by three men with hockey sticks on a subway platform in a hit-and-run attack in Manhattan that left him with head injuries. Jean-Luc Barsch, 50, was walking through the crowded subway stop at E. 59th Street and Lexington Avenue on Tuesday evening when he was surrounded and knocked to the ground by three men who smashed his head against the ground and repeatedly stabbed him with a skate hockey stick, according to police and sources familiar with the case. He was left bloody and in pain with head wounds, a broken jaw, and severe face and head injuries, the sources said. Investigators are looking into whether the suspects targeted Barsch because he is Jewish, the sources said. Barsch is being treated at Roosevelt Hospital after he was rushed there by police after the attack and was found in need of a cranioplasty, a procedure that involves the surgical implantation of a bone-reinforcement plate to correct a skull defect, according to a spokesman for the hospital. "Our hospital has extensive medical facilities and the expertise to provide care to patients, regardless of their religious or ethnic background," the spokesman said. "We are always thankful for the assistance we receive from the community." A surveillance video released by the NYPD showed three men pacing around Barsch as they waited for the M4 train to arrive, looking at their cellphones and apparently loitering. One of the men, who is of Middle Eastern origin, is wearing a red polo shirt with a "L" logo on it, and the other two are wearing hoodies. The three men are then seen running away as the subway arrived and Barsch gets up, a stunned expression on his face, before limping off. He was hit in the head while he was on the ground on the platform, sources said. The NYPD is conducting a canvass of the area for witnesses and surveillance footage of the attack. No arrests have been made. 1 1 1
