I have an idea for a game which is entirely designed around Game Center. I am going to make it a paid app, so I understand that it does not come with the standard iOS capabilities that are built in to Game Center. Therefore I will need to make my app work in the background, without a user being able to quit it. But this brings up a problem. I want to test how well my app works with Game Center. My plan for this is: Set up a test account and test the app in the background by myself Get some feedback through Game Center and then go back to the test account and swap accounts, the test account being my normal account What I don't know is how to get feedback about my app in the background. I can't get a bad feedback rating because there isn't one. I haven't needed my own test account before because my users can create their own accounts. They do so now, but they can't do so with the test account, because it is logged in with my own account. So the question is: Can I create a "test account" as a separate entity from my actual account? If so, how? Can I make my app accessible to testers in the background? If so, how? A: This is a consequence of using Game Center as a payment system. If your user could create and use a test account as they normally would on iOS, then it would cost you money. A: Can I create a "test account" as a separate entity from my actual account? If so, how? Not really. The only thing you can do is set up a different game title and description, but this is only useful if you need to do things like change the price of a game. It's not a way to prove your game works at all. The best you can do is have a fake game entry in Game Center for your app, and then do a request to get the information about that game on a separate app. This might take a while to put together, but it's probably your only option (until Apple gives developers 0cc13bf012
