The Role of Vedic Literature in Hinduism: a Collection of Essays. Written by Jashwant Singh Full text PDF Download. That the Vedas were composed in the language of the people who read them, and that the sacred books of the Hindus are essentially religious works composed in the language of the people "that the Vedas have been primarily anthologies of Vedic and other religious compositions read by people and in the language in which they were composed " there is no question. It is an observable fact that the Vedas are a collection of religious and literary compositions in the Prakrit tongue. That this language was intelligible to the people who used it " especially the Aryans " and were read by them in their villages, towns and cities " is an incontestable fact. It is not even admissible to maintain that the Vedic literature was composed in words of an ancient dialect, incapable of intelligibility to the people who used it. Today, the whole of the Vedic literature as a whole, of one hundred thousand stanzas, has been translated into English, and the Vedic shlokas (verses) have been translated into English prose and verse. That the classical Sanskrit literature also consists of a collection of religious and literary compositions in Prakrit is also an incontestable fact. The Vedic writings and the writings of the classical Sanskrit are like complete anthologies of compositions of religious and literary characters. The Vedic literature is one of the major portions of the Vedic religion, one of its religious writings, it is noted in the text, which is part of a popularization of the Vedic literature, that Aryan literature began to develop in India when there first began to appear "
