As the race to find the next successor to President Barack Obama is heating up, the Democrats are aiming to harness two of the most powerful and popular figures in the nation. Those figures are the economy and the economy. And President Obama is, at his core, a master of economics. If you wonder why, as the country heads into a November election with unemployment hovering above 8 percent, “Obamatrade” may have helped create thousands of jobs, it is because he knows how to design and successfully execute an effective economic plan. His second term was all about the economy. It began with Obama, to repeat a saying attributed to Winston Churchill, talking with the incoming president-elect, Donald Trump, about the two of them working together to protect manufacturing. That arrangement is still in place — this time with the current Democratic president at the helm, and Trump in a position to help boost the economy. But while it has been fascinating to watch Obama and former Trump aide Stephen Bannon work together, this week, much more drama may emerge in the coming weeks. As all eyes turn to Obama for his potential advice, or coaching, he is expected to be viewed as a model for any candidate seeking to generate economic growth and job creation. An Obama, or even a Biden, economic plan could be seen as the equivalent of an Obama or a Biden health care plan. Each could be powerful, and each would be a focus of the 2016 campaign. First to the economy. Bill Clinton has been a bit down on Obama’s economic record, with an ear-to-ear grin on his face. The overall impact of Obama’s policies has not been nearly as large as the former president had hoped — a problem too many economists share. “We believe that he made the appropriate things happen in 2008 and it just took longer to get here than we thought it would,” Clinton said at the Democratic National Convention. He pointed to the 2009 stimulus package, a jobs program and a broad re-regulatory effort as where Obama should be credited. Of the Obama economic program, Clinton said, “Well that is what happens when
