[The phenotype-specific distribution of thioredoxin in different organs of mice]. The distribution of thioredoxin was studied in genetically intact (C3H/He), partially thymectomized, and C57BL/6 mice. The localization of this protein in various organs was compared in inbred C3H and C57BL mice (both the males and females) and B6D2F1 hybrid mice (the males).

The content of thioredoxin was found to be significantly higher in the male thymus than in the female thymus. The thioredoxin level in the thymus and other organs is decreased by the partial thymectomy (6 weeks after the operation). Immunostaining with the use of the specific antibody showed a statistically significant, 2-3-fold higher content of thioredoxin in the lung of male B6D2F1 mice than that in female mice of the same genotype. This difference was most pronounced in the epithelial cells of the lungs of B6D2F1 mice. The thioredoxin content in the epithelial cells of the other organs was not significantly different between the sexes of B6D2F1 mice. The data obtained suggest that the thioredoxin content may be differently regulated in tissues of mice of different genotypes and sexes. A conclusion is drawn that there is a phenotype-specific distribution of thioredoxin in different organs of mice. Q: Is Wertheim's rule used to estimate the standard errors for the ratios of means of independent samples? I just encountered a context where we needed to estimate the standard errors for the ratio of means of two independent random samples, but a paper I am reading referred to Wertheim's rule. I don't know whether Wertheim's rule is the best method for estimating the standard errors for the ratios of means of two independent samples. I just have only seen Nonsnake's rule and Mokken's rule. A: I guess you meant "rules" for the confidence interval, right? If so, I am not so sure that these tools are useful for the samples are independent. In general, for the samples which are dependent (or for a single sample with the same samples but
