The effect of white matter lesions (WML) on cognitive functions has been estimated using magnetic resonance imaging (MRI), but WML are not associated with significant changes of cortical atrophy. However, it is not known whether these changes are detectable with neuropsychological tests. We examined cognitive functions, such as attention, information processing speed, memory, and mental functions, in 89 patients with dementia of the Alzheimer type (DAT) and 63 patients with dementia of the cerebrovascular type (DCT), whose brains were fully examined with MRI. All subjects were female and were in a stable condition from a functional standpoint. WML were detected with a 1.5-T brain MRI on axial images and were located in the frontal lobe, parietal lobe, and temporal lobe in both groups. The distribution of WML was significantly more marked in the DCT group than in the DAT group. The Mini-Mental State Examination and the Neuropsychiatric Inventory (NPI) were significantly worse in the DCT group than in the DAT group. The attention, information processing speed, and memory in the DCT group were significantly worse in comparison with the DAT group. Among the cognitive functions, the difference in the speed of information processing was the most marked. The attenuation of cognitive functions, especially speed, in patients with dementia may be due to not only the specific morphological changes of cortical atrophy in dementias, but also to the WML on subcortical white matter tracts.Q: How to create a WiX action that writes to a file I'm trying to create an action in WiX that writes to a file. A white privilege statement to share with my students. I have two white students in my math class. It is a relatively small class. Both come from good families, have done very well academically, and are strong students. After our first assignment we all sat together and talked about our assignments. One of my students, April, mentioned that her parents had passed away and that the little bit of a grief she had experienced was different for her because she was from a long line of extremely wealthy white people. As I listened to April talk, I realised that I could have missed a critical aspect of her experience. Staying safely on the surface of things (as students struggle in many ways to do) I assumed that she was describing how her parents had died. This is the kind of mistake that occurs when one assumes the "default position", which is to assume that one is in an environment where everyone is like you. I never thought that April had any doubts about the permanency of her parents death because she was white. We talked about the importance of paying attention to one's environment as well as one's social class when learning to look at the world. We discussed the need for students to think about the implications of privilege. And then we returned to our math homework. A week later in class, April reminded me that we had talked about the fact that she was from a long line of wealthy white people. I immediately apologised for not remembering that. I immediately thought of a couple other students who had been asked a similar question. I realised that I should have given more attention to April's experience and reminded her of the importance of addressing differences. It was clear that, although April had come from a wealthy, white background, she had some challenges with the normal things that wealthy people don't have to worry 6d1f23a050
