It is not a full solution but not difficult to extend or adapt it to your needs. As I write, the Times is running a very important piece on Edward Norton. The reviewer, Richard Lawson, asks us to consider the implications of Norton's sudden choice to accept a leading role in The Incredible Hulk. The suggestion is that this is the first in a long line of moves showing Norton's reluctance to play the type of roles typically reserved for the young men who have held his romantic attentions over the years. There are, of course, two ways to interpret this about-face: One is that Norton has some qualms about casting himself as a nerd-high-insufferable torturer of people whom he's responsible for, and the other is that Norton has suddenly realized that he can't play the type of tortured nerd-high-insufferable torturer that he prefers so. But there's a third way to view this: That he's tired of playing nothing but tortured nerds. This is the option that is so obvious that nobody even has to ask why it hasn't occurred to anyone before. It's obvious, obviously, that the young men Norton has dated through the years want to be tortured. He wouldn't even have to realize this; this is the most obvious social truth one can imagine. After having been so many tortured nerds, he wants to play the hero who is able to avoid being tortured. This seems obvious. It's the obvious reason, which doesn't need to be postulated, why Norton wanted the lead role in Dancer in the Dark. In fact, a better way of phrasing the second way in which Norton might have been planning to figure this out is to say that he had decided at some point that he could more profitably play a character who isn't tortured. Since Norton has spent years watching people he dates being tortured, he might have thought that in the process he had been witnessing the key to the purest form
