Pit bulls contributed to 66% (370) of these deaths. Combined, pit bulls and rottweilers contributed to 76% of the fatal dog attacks. | More » Neurologists interested in a career in veterinary medicine have a wide variety of specialties to choose from, but the one they make their career choice based on is likely to be one of two—neurology or emergency medicine. A neurosurgeon spends the majority of their time operating on people, and performs most of their surgery on the brain and spinal cord. For those who end up choosing to go into neurosurgery, the first thing they need to know is that it is physically a very tough profession. There is a lot of intensive physical activity involved in most neurosurgical cases, including the long, arduous hours that are spent waiting in the operating room for hours at a time. Neurosurgeons also work extensively with pressure equipment, and sometimes have to work on patients who have been subjected to traumatic injuries. This means that neurosurgeons will have to have an understanding of high risk procedures. It can also mean having to work quickly, since a neurosurgical patient can die if a complication suddenly arises from a delay in emergency treatment. In addition to having to be aware of potential dangers, neurosurgeons must be able to deal with life and death situations. The work is highly stressful, and neurosurgeons are often required to operate on patients who are suffering from life-threatening conditions. Emergency medicine is one of the most popular specialties amongst veterinary students who want to go into veterinary medicine. This is because it is the one primary care specialty where people who need veterinary care can
