In a previously reported series, we found that non-nephrotic nephritis was the presenting symptom in 2.6% of infants with fetal hydantoin syndrome (FHS) and occurred within the first 6 months of life in 96% of these children. Three infants who presented with FHS after 6 months of age developed nephrotic syndrome, and renal biopsy in these cases revealed diffuse and focal proliferative glomerulonephritis. The etiology of their nephrotic syndrome was immune complex-mediated, indicating a high recurrence rate for FHS after the postnatal period. Of 19 control patients with infantile-onset nephrotic syndrome, similar ultrastructural abnormalities were observed in the glomeruli of 3 (16%) of 18 cases. A common feature of FHS and infantile-onset idiopathic nephrotic syndrome in infancy is the absence of familial clustering. Another characteristic feature of FHS is the presence of specific histologic abnormalities. In the present study, we found that severe mesangial proliferative glomerulonephritis was a consistent finding in the renal biopsies from patients with FHS. Together, these data suggest a role for these unique histologic abnormalities in the pathogenesis of FHS and in the pathogenesis of the idiopathic nephrotic syndrome in infancy.Basic Bible Studies This was an online course with some personal interaction.
