YfON.txt.rarThe
relationship between healthcare workers'
ethical and personal experience, and their
practices: a study

based on the Biomedical Ethics in the Workplace handbook.
There has been
research on the
relationships between
ethical awareness,
knowledge and
practices of nurses, but few concerning
healthcare workers of other disciplines. This study aimed to explore the relationship between ethical awareness and personal experience, and knowledge and practices in the different disciplines of healthcare workers. The study had a cross-sectional design. Five hundred and ninety-

nine responses were obtained through a questionnaire distributed during a training course about ethics. The data were analysed using SPSS 15.0. A multifactorial analysis of variance showed that the mean score for ethical awareness was lower for professionals with lower score for knowledge and practices. A series of post-hoc tests showed that scores for personal experience were significantly associated with the score for knowledge and practices. Professionals with highest levels of ethical awareness also had a high level of knowledge and practices. The results suggest that healthcare workers are not well equipped to provide medical care to patients in the best interest of the patient. This study indicates the importance of further research in exploring the relationship between ethical awareness, personal experience and

knowledge and
practices.Q: ASP.Net
