Depression and anxiety among patients with heart disease: A systematic review. Patients with heart disease are at higher risk of depression and anxiety than the general population and may differ in their risk and clinical presentation. The aim of this study was to explore current prevalence of depression and anxiety among patients with heart disease and to determine risk factors associated with depression and anxiety among patients with heart disease. A systematic review of the literature was performed in MEDLINE, PsycINFO, EMBASE, Cochrane library, and PEDro. A total of 19 studies (including 1 randomized controlled trial and 18 observational studies) were found to be eligible for inclusion in this review. The most commonly used instruments to measure depression and anxiety were the Hospital Anxiety and Depression Scale and Beck Depression Inventory-II. The prevalence of anxiety and depression was around 16% and 6%, respectively. The risk factors associated with depression and anxiety included male gender, the presence of poor physical functioning, and higher levels of depression. The prevalence of depression and anxiety among patients with heart disease is high.

The identification of patients at risk of depression and anxiety is important, because they can
